Publishers' Weekly

This is a long-time publication covering the book industry. It faltered for a time, but they are really making a comeback in terms of being relevant to authors. They offer some cutting-edge online and written methods for writers and publishers to promote their books. I've enjoyed working with them.

www.Booklife.com is PW's new web site for indie authors. They also have a free weekly eNewsletter called: The Booklife Report that provides great information on publishing from the indie author site. Also, if you want to keep up with the industry, PW DAILY is a good resource for news. Here's a link to those eNewsletters:

INDIE BOOK DISTRIBUTORS

IBPA Distributors and Wholesalers A well-vetted list by a respectable organization, the Independent Book Producers Association. The IBPA website, IBPA.com, contains terrific updated information for indie authors and includes an innovative learning center that contains a number of good information videos. Both this list and IBPA itself are of great help to Indie authors.

Top Independent Book Distributors This list is kept by John Kremer, JohnKremer@bookmarket.com, who is a well-known and respected consultant in the book field. I do not know how well-vetted this is and many do not take single books. Still, it's worth perusing.

List of book distributors - Wikipedia, the free encyclopedia This is a shorter list that includes most of the major distributors. Again, not all will handle single books.

I highly recommend that authors build a presence on Goodreads, which now has more than 30 million subscribers. To build an 'Author's Page' on Goodreads, register and sign in, then scroll down to the bottom of the page until you see "Author's Program" Click on that and follow the directions. This is an important place for indie writers and publishers.
